

Sydenham Park

This is the entrance to the Golf Course. As you can see the public isn't welcome.

I parked in the dead end and walked across to the planting zones. This is looking across to the King's Rd overpass. Lots of open space full of boxthorn, artichoke thistle and serrated tussock. I figure if they decided to put their sports areas here and avoided our planting areas we could negotiate a win-win situation. Let's face it we're never going to get the money to return this to native grassland.

This is the planting area near the gully. Most of the stuff is doing OK but it's a tough site.

This is looking back at the site from the model aircraft building.

This is the area next to the escarpment where we were working a few years ago. Plants are hanging in there but they should be doing better. Another tough site.

These plants with red berries are doing well. Perhaps we should plant more of these.
